Part B
(Comprehension tests)

Part B has comprehension tests with 5 passages. Read carefully each passage followed by eight questions each and answer the respective questions in OMR answer sheets. Each question in Part B carries one mark for a total of 40 marks.

Passage 1

After fighting a losing battle with the growing tide of municipal waste, the Ministry of Environment and Forests has notified the New Solid Waste Management Rules with clear responsibilities assigned to various classes of consumers. For these rules to have any significant impact, however, the local bodies in charge of implementation should appeal to the rational impulses of communities — a small effort at segregating trash at source would be a good thing for their household budgets. Cities and towns would then have to provide the logistical chain to evacuate waste, with a cash compensation system in place for the consumer. In the absence of such a system, the rules issued 16 years ago failed miserably. Urban municipal bodies found it convenient to merely transport waste to the suburbs, sometimes through private agencies that secured lucrative long-term contracts. Policy failure is all too evident when Minister for Environment and Forest says that the estimated 62 million tons of waste a year is not fully collected or treated. Worryingly, it will go up to some 165 million tons in 2030, and increasing air and water pollution from mountains of garbage as seen in Mumbai and Bengaluru in recent times could be witnessed in more places.

A productive start to containing the problem could be made if urban governments show the political will to rein in bulk generators of municipal solid waste. For instance, the provisions in the new rules for hotels and restaurants to support composting, or biomethanation, and for large housing societies, commercial establishments and other bulk producers to segregate waste, need to be rigorously enforced. Cess funds collected for the Swachh Bharat programme could be deployed to scale up infrastructure for composting, biomethanation and recycling, which the minister admits are grossly inadequate. Evidently, the Centre and the State governments have not so far taken the existing rules seriously: less than a third of the collected waste is being processed. Even where environmentally conscious citizens segregate at source, the chain of management dumps it all in landfills. The central monitoring committee under the Ministry should ensure that local bodies do not continue functioning in business-as-usual mode. They should align their operations, including waste management contracts, with the new rules under the annual operating plan. The Ministry should also enlist the services of rag pickers under formal systems such as cooperatives. Although there are provisions for fines for littering and non-segregation, this should be a second-order priority for municipalities, which should focus principally on creating reliable systems to handle different waste streams. If India could start with the separation of its ‘wet’ waste from the rest and produce good compost that could transform cities and towns into clean and green havens filled with trees, gardens, lakes and rivers. It would also salvage millions of tons of recyclable plastic, precious metals and other materials. Studies on waste management confirm that landfills swallow precious wealth every day. The time has come to recover it.

The understanding of the concept of representation has changed considerably throughout the modern era. An early modern meaning of representation is most usually associated with theatrical characterisation in the sense of how one person depicts another. This is an activity which involves interpretation, a certain amount of licence and embodies a good deal of 'personal opinion' on the part of the actor. From the 17th century, representation came to incorporate the idea of a person acting legally 'on behalf of another', a view that reflects Hobbes' (1691) Leviathan. During the 18th century this developed more overtly political connotations. In parallel with the growth of democratic ideas, representation came increasingly to be associated with the notion representing the wishes of citizens, whether directly or indirectly, through mediators or unmediated (Weale, 1999).

Representation can, according to a Rousseauian, unmediated and direct conception of democracy, be carried out by the citizen body as a whole, in the manner we believe to have been practiced in classical Athens. Athenian democracy, while it might have been representative of the citizen body, was completely unrepresentative of the majority of inhabitants (since the citizen body was defined very narrowly, omitting women and other categories of resident). Such a model, even if it were constituted inclusively, would in any case be appropriate only for relatively small units of population. This became less and less feasible with the growth of modern society, particularly after the establishment of industrial capitalism. So ideas of indirect democracy, where small groups of people represent the views of the citizen body as a whole came to prevail.

Answer question nos. 69-76 based on the passage above.

69. The understanding of the concept of representation has

a. undergone transformation
b. not changed much
c. been distorted
d. undergone legal scrutiny

76. Representation as unmediated and direct conception of democracy has become
   a. very important today
   b. market unfriendly
   c. less and less feasible today
   d. the model that outshines others

Passage 3

The Clinton administration’s early emphasis on the promotion of human rights, non-proliferation and preventive diplomacy fused into activism on Kashmir. Just when the two sides needed to build trust and confidence in each other, US diplomacy on Kashmir and nuclear non-proliferation stirred deep anxieties in India about American intentions and motivations. What from the American viewpoint appeared as an attempt to address the problems of stability in the subcontinent was seen in India as inimical to two of India’s core national security interests—its territorial integrity and the preservation of the nuclear option. The US forays in Kashmir appeared to India as an intervention on behalf of Pakistan when Islamabad was determined to take advantage of New Delhi’s political troubles in the Kashmir valley; the American refusal to countenance the brazen Pakistani support of terrorism added insult to Indian injury. Furthermore, the relentless American pressure in the 1990s on India’s nuclear and missile programmes and its attempts to cap, reduce and eliminate over a period of time India’s strategic programmes suggested that Washington had no desire to accommodate India’s political aspirations on the world stage. All the political energies in India-US relations were expended in dealing with these two problems but with no real movement forward. It was only at the end of 1990s, when India first defied the United States on the CTBT and then tested nuclear weapons, that Washington was forced to take more pragmatic approach to India. Although President Clinton’s visit dramatically changed the tone and tenor of American attitude towards India, it was the Bush administration that opened the doors for a long-term strategic relationship between New Delhi and Washington.

Answer question nos. 77-84 based on the passage above

77. According to the passage, under whose Presidency was India-US relations taken forward most dynamically?
   a. Clinton
   b. Bush
   c. Obama
   d. None of the above

   a. economy and terrorism
   b. Kashmir and nuclear issue
   c. environmental issues and terrorism
   d. democracy and human rights

79. Which of the following titles would be appropriate for this passage?
   a. India and Kashmir
   b. Pakistan and Kashmir
   c. Security Policy in 1990s
   d. India-US relations since 1990s

80. US foreign policy towards India aimed at supporting
   a. India’s interest
   b. regional stability
   c. Pakistan’s interest
   d. None of the above

81. American foreign policy towards India changed due to
   a. India’s economic reforms
   b. the attack from Pakistan
   c. India’s nuclear test

   d. Decrease it
Passage 4

When the caste association turned to the state for furthering their purposes, their initial claims were aimed at raising caste status in terms of the values and structure of the caste order. But as liberal and democratic ideas penetrated to wider sections of the population, the aims of the caste association began to shift accordingly. Instead of demanding temple entry and prestigious caste names and histories in the census, the associations began to press for places in the new administrative and educational institutions, and for political representation. Independence and the realization of political democracy intensified these new concerns. Caste associations attempted to have their members nominated for elective office, working through existing parties or forming their own; to maximize caste representation and influence in state cabinets and lesser governing bodies; and to use ministerial, legislative, and administrative channels to press for action on caste objectives in the welfare, educational, and economic realms. Perhaps the most significant aspect of the caste association in the contemporary era, however, is its capacity to organize the politically illiterate mass electorate, thus making possible in some measure the realization of its aspirations, and educating large sections of it in the methods and values of its aspirations, and educating large sections of it in the methods and values of political democracy.

The caste association is no longer a natural association in the sense in which caste was and is. It is beginning to take on features of the voluntary association. Membership in caste association is not purely ascriptive; birth in the caste is a necessary, but not a sufficient, condition for membership. One must also 'join' the (Rajput) Kshatriya Mahasabha or the (Jat) Kisan Sabha through some conscious act involving various degrees of identification ranging from attendance at caste association meetings or voting for candidates supported by caste association leaders, to paying membership dues. The caste association has generally both a potential and an actual membership; when it speaks, it often claims to speak for the potential represented in the full caste membership. While the purpose of caste are wide-ranging and diffuse, affecting every aspect of members' life paths, the caste association has come to specialize in politics. The traditional authority and functions of the sub caste are declining, but the caste association's concern with politics and its rewards serve to sustain caste loyalty and identification. This loyalty and sense of identification tend to retain the exclusive quality of the natural association; the caste association seems to have a more complete and intense command of its members' commitments than is usually the case with voluntary associations.

Since modern means of transportation and communication have had the effect of broadening caste, binding together local sub-castes which had been relatively autonomous in to geographically extended associations, caste associations today usually parallel administrative and political units – states, districts, sub-districts, and towns - whose offices and powers of legislation or decision-making are the object of the caste associations' efforts.

Passage 5

To coerce a man is to deprive him of freedom – freedom from what? [...] I do not propose to discuss either the history or the more than two hundred senses of the word. I propose to examine no more than two of these senses... The first of these political senses of freedom or liberty (I shall use both words to mean the same), which (following much precedent) I shall call the 'negative' sense, is involved in the answer to the question 'What is the area within which a subject – a person or a group of persons – is or should be left to do or be what he is able to do or be, without interference by other persons?' The second, which I shall call the positive sense, is involved in the answer to the question 'What, or who, is the source of control or interference, that can determine someone to do, or be, one thing rather than another?' The two questions are clearly different, even though the answers to them may overlap.

I am normally said to be free to the degree to which no human being interferes with my activity. Political liberty in this sense is simply the area within which a man can act unobstructed by others. If I am prevented by other persons from doing what I could otherwise do, I am to that degree unfree; and if this area is contracted by other men beyond a certain minimum, I can be described as being enslaved or...coerced.

Coercion is not, however, a term that covers every form of inability. If I say that I am unable to jump more than 10 feet in the air... it would be eccentric to say that I am to that degree enslaved or coerced. Coercion implies deliberate interference of other human beings within the area in which I could otherwise act. You lack political liberty only if you are prevented from attaining a goal by other human beings. Mere incapacity to attain a goal is not lack of political freedom. This is brought out by such modern expressions as 'economic freedom' and its counterpart, 'economic slavery'. It is argued, very plausibly, that if a man is too poor to afford something on which there is no legal ban... he is as little free to have it as he would be if it were forbidden him by law. If my poverty were a kind of disease, which prevented me from buying bread... as lameness prevents me from running, this inability would not naturally be described as a lack of freedom, least of all political freedom. It is only because I believe that my inability to get a given thing is due to the fact that other human beings have made arrangements whereby I am, whereas others are not, prevented from having enough money with which to pay for it, that I think of myself a victim of coercion or slavery. In other words, this use of the term depends on a particular social and economic theory about the cause of my poverty or weakness.[... ] The criterion of oppression is the part that I believe to be played by other human beings, directly or indirectly, with or without the intention of doing so, in frustrating my wishes. By being free-in this sense I mean not being interfered with by others. The wider the area of non-interference the wider my freedom.
